A federal appeals court blocked a D.C. law that makes it difficult for gun owners to get concealed carry permits.

Court blocks D.C.'s strict concealed carry law

Appeals panel rules the city's 'good reason' rule is unconstitutional

THE DISTRICT

A federal appeals court on Tuesday blocked a D.C. law that makes it difficult for gun owners to get concealed carry permits by requiring them to show they have a good reason to carry a weapon.

A divided three-judge panel for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit said the law requiring people to show "good reason to fear injury" or another "proper reason" to carry a weapon infringes on Second Amendment rights.

City law now requires residents to register guns kept at their homes or businesses. Anyone who wants to carry a weapon outside the home needs a separate concealed carry license.

The judges ordered a lower court to enjoin the city from enforcing the "good reason" law, but it remains in effect while D.C. Attorney General Karl Racine decides whether to ask for a full appellate review. If he does and the judges refuse to rehear the case, the order blocking the law would take effect shortly after, although Racine's office could also appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Racine said Tuesday that his office is committed to working with the mayor and city council "to continue fighting for common-sense gun reforms."

"The District of Columbia's 'good reason' requirement for concealed-carry permits is a common-sense gun regulation, and four federal appeals courts have rejected challenges to similar laws in other states," Racine said in a statement.

Under the law, reasons to get a permit might include a personal threat, or a job that requires a person to carry or protect cash or valuables. The police department has approved 126 concealed carry licenses and denied 400 other applications since July 2008, police said this month.
